Robert A. Bradley, MD, began practicing and promoting the principles of true natural childbirth in 1947 and wrote the first edition of Husband-Coached Childbirth in 1965. At the time of his death in 1998, the Bradley Method had directly affected more than half a million births. Marjie Hathaway is a cofounder and executive director of the American Academy of Husband-Coached Childbirth. She has traveled the country training Bradley teachers since 1970. Hathaway is the vice president of the American Academy of Husband-Coached Childbirth.

Introduction The administrator of Porter Memorial Hospital in Denver, Colorado, called our office one day in 1961. He had received a request from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for permission to film a documentary on husband-coached natural childbirth for presentation on their program, This Hour Has Seven Days. Mrs. Merle Grosman, of Toronto, a natural-childbirth mother herself and a member of the Natural Childbirth Association at the time, had initiated the idea and written to ask if we had patients who would cooperate. In discussing it with her, we decided to utilize a woman having her first baby. There is a misconception promoted by the unknowing that having a baby by natural childbirth might be possible after having had other babies, but not with the first! Accordingly we contacted our due or overdue primigravidas (women experiencing their first pregnancies), and after Tom Koch, director, and his crew of cameramen arrived, these women were photographed with their husbands at class, doing prenatal exercises, etc., as participants in mental and physical preparation for childbirth. Then everyone waited patiently for one of them to go into labor. The law of the perversity of nature in general and pregnant women in particular manifested itself in that we had had many births just before our Canadian visitors arrived, then had to wait a week before one went into labor. This served to illustrate again that babies cannot read calendars and that doctors cannot tell when labor will begin. As an honorary life member of the Toronto Natural Childbirth Association I was very much honored to be chosen to illustrate the great principles involved. I was also embarrassed that it took so long before a patient went into labor. I was bound by medical principles not to interfere with the development of a baby by forcing or inducing labor for anyone's convenience, so everyone waited. Finally at midnight one night the phone rang, and Patricia and Gary Petersen announced they were on their way to the hospital. They were met at the hospital entrance by the somewhat sleepy but efficient TV camera crew of the CBC, who carefully followed the course of labor and birth with cameras and sound recorders. The visitors were intrigued and delighted by the calm self-assurance of these two young people who confidently went about the happy business of bearing a child as they had each been trained to do. The husband had signed in for his wife while the nurse in attendance had performed the prep. He then joined his wife, to remain with her throughout labor and birth and share the requested privilege of walking back with her from the delivery room. Their happy chatter as they strolled together in the early stages of labor would be rhythmically interrupted by uterine contractions. As her labor picked up in intensity they returned to the labor room and concentrated on their respective tasks. The old term "labor pains" just couldn't properly be applied here, for the observers could see no evidence of pain. The husband busily cranked the bed flat, arranged an extra pillow under his wife's raised knee as she turned on her side and assumed the "running" position of early first-stage labor that she had learned in class. During the contractions the young mother would calmly lie curled up, peacefully close her eyes, and automatically relax all the muscles of her body. The young husband tenderly placed a guiding hand on his wife's abdomen and directed her diaphragmatic breathing. He would also lean over and maintain a constant soft whispering in his wife's ear during this interval. The observing guests could not make out his words, but the endearing tone of his voice made apparent that the content was indeed the repetitious love "gobbledygook" with which she was so familiar. In prenatal classes the husbands are instructed to repeat verbally during contractions the intimate "love line" that was so effective in the moonlight originally and started the chain of events leading to the pregnancy. When the muscle contractions of the uterus subsided, the chatter resumed, to be momentarily interrupted again as the uterus went about its work uninhibited. Between contractions he would rhythmically massage his wife's low back "saddle" area, accompanied by murmurs of approval from her. Whenever a contraction occurred, the same calm pattern of relaxation, abdominal breathing, and love talk would be automatically repeated. As time went on, the husband occasionally slipped ice chips into his wife's mouth with a spoon to counter the drying effect of mouth breathing, which is part of total relaxation during contractions. The couple performed their respective tasks calmly, automatically, with light chatter between contractions. The observers from Toronto were impressed by the obvious fact that here were two people working happily together. Each knew, without being told, exactly what they were about. As time went on, the interval between contractions gradually became shorter, the chatter accordingly gradually diminished, and the parents concentrated more and more on their respective tasks. Each said, when asked later, that they completely forgot about the presence of the observers; they were too busy. The idea of some sort of medication being utilized in such an efficient, peaceful performance never occurred to the performers and seemed ludicrous to the observers. The close relationship between husband and wife, the total dependence upon each other, was heartwarming to see—that it truly “takes two to tango” was never more manifest. Again, the obvious ego-deflating question was put to me as the obstetrician: “Who needs a doctor for this?” My occasional vaginal examinations to determine the dilatation of the cervix constituted rather rude interruptions that momentarily disrupted the smooth working pattern of the process. They obviously got along better when the doctor wasn’t around. I answered their question by stressing again that the doctor’s role is vital only when complications occur. Comparing birthing to swimming, the doctor is the lifeguard. Both swimming and birthing carry an irreducible minimal risk, and lifeguards and doctors are necessary, but only for complications. Good swimmers and good birthers need them to be present, but just in case problems arise. As labor progressed, the parents became oblivious to everything and everyone as they carefully concentrated on the job at hand. This concentration was enhanced by the quiet, hushed “bedroom” atmosphere that is maintained in the labor rooms of this hospital. The importance of such an atmosphere is stressed as part of nurses’ training in a course on the principles of natural childbirth. Labor is what the term implies, hard work, and although mothers are trained to deliberately relax all muscles during uterine contractions, the uterus is of sufficient size and power as a muscular organ to produce perspiration in the mother in the later stages of labor. The husband’s role included getting a cool washcloth and applying it tenderly to the perspiring brow of his wife. Such seemingly trivial acts reduce the tasks of nurses and direct the gratitude of a mother to the one she loves . . . her husband. Between contractions, at the wife’s request, the husband would alter her position occasionally by adjusting the bed so that she was half-sitting, with two pillows under her arms. Again, the familiar talk and cooperation would be evident. The labor progressed to the transition stage, and the husband gently encouraged the techniques associated with this stage, knowing the need for change. The young mother shortly announced the urge to push, ushering in the second stage of labor. After a short vaginal check to verify the complete opening of the cervix, the husband adjusted the pillows behind his wife’s shoulders and coached her in assuming the squatting position in the elevated bed. With the beginning of each contraction the mother would take two breaths and exhale them, waiting for the contraction to build in intensity. This was followed by breath-holding and the expulsive pushing with contractions. After a few pushes in bed, the husband, doctor, and observers changed into scrub suits, caps, and masks while the attending nurses wheeled the mother to the nearby birth room. The husband took his place at the head of the birth-room bed on what I call the “daddy stool, which prior to natural childbirth was occupied by an anesthetist. He resumed his coaching and adjusted the supporting pillows during each contraction to fit the contours of his wife's shoulders and back as she calmly held her breath, curled forward, and pulled her knees back under her armpits in the squatting position on the downward-tilted birth bed. This position served to open wide the soft tissues of the birth canal to allow gradual descent of the infant. Because of the degree of additional exertion required of the mother in this stage, the husband utilized the cold, moist washcloth, not only to wipe away perspiration from her brow, but to have his wife bite on between contractions to maintain moisture on her lips, as he had been trained to do. In this, the second stage, the infant had passed from the uterus into the vaginal canal, and the uterus now slowed down in the frequency of contractions with longer intervals between. This resulted in a return of the chatter between wife and husband. The observers were again impressed by the calm, peaceful attitude of the parents as they conversed between contractions about whether the baby would be a girl or a boy, and eagerly looked forward to knowing soon. The husband made an admiring comment on his wife's ability to hold her breath during contractions. As the baby passed into the world, announcing her arrival with a lusty yell, the mutual exclamations of delight, "It's a girl!" by husband and wife, their shiny-eyed wonder at the miracle of this new life, and their mutual pride in accomplishment made a picture of wholesome togetherness bordering on ecstasy. I then handed the infant to the mother to hold. This first real meeting with her child was accompanied by such a delighted, joyous expression on the mother's face that the husband, ready with his camera, recorded this important moment as a permanent record for the baby book. The umbilical cord was later clamped and cut while the mother was holding the baby. The baby was then put at the mother's side for the first introduction to breast-feeding. The purpose of this from an obstetrician's point of view was not primarily nourishment, but to activate the reflex that stimulates uterine contractions to separate the placenta and decrease bleeding from the placental site. This is a safety factor for the mother and baby. Breast-feeding also provides nourishment and this first feeding of colostrum, which provides immunities for the baby to keep it safe in its new environment. The colostrum starts the production of vitamin K in the baby's gut, building up to a peak at the eighth day and is important for blood clotting. Colostrum also acts as a laxative to get the baby passing meconium, which cleans the bowels out, reducing problems with jaundice. Having the baby at the breast, close and skin to skin, intensifies bonding between mother, father, and baby. During this period of handling and nursing the child, husband and wife literally had their heads together. Their constant "parent talk" to the baby, calling her by name •Kirsten Lynn• and expressions of delight to each other were accompanied by intimate indications of mutual love, which made all the attendants feel like intruders. The parents were playing with the baby, absorbed in counting fingers and toes, commenting on whose hair color it inherited, and so forth. Each parent was then given a celebratory glass of iced orange juice – for the mother to replenish blood sugar, depleted from its utilization by the uterus, and to correct the drying effect of mouth breathing during labor. Orange juice also helps replace fluids lost during the birth process and provides sodium for fluid balance and potassium to prevent dizziness. The father is also given a glass of orange juice as a token of appreciation for his important participation and to maintain the great principle of sharing all aspects of this beautiful experience with his wife. We joyfully refer to the orange juice as refreshment served at the original birthday party – which is the best of all birthday parties; the others are just pale substitutes for the real thing. Besides, only naturally born babies can accurately celebrate true “birthdays,” the others are more appropriately celebrating “delivery days.” The mother then expressed the desire to walk back from the birth room. She was given her robe and slippers, and with the baby in one arm, a glass of orange juice in the other hand, and a beaming, proud husband alongside, she strolled happily out the door and down the hall – mission accomplished. A helpful nurse, using the husband’s camera, took a final picture of this new family group. Since 1917 as a natural baby myself, observing animals on the farm and as a teacher of natural childbirth, I have seen this happy series of events repeated thousands of times. To our visitors from Toronto it was a new and never-to-be-forgotten experience. I was delighted to have our busy office hours interrupted a few hours later by the director and photographers, who stopped by to express their admiration and praise of the method, and their gratitude for the privilege of witnessing the birth. Most significant to me was that they had sent flowers to the new mother and were passing cigars around as enthusiastically as if each were the father of the baby! The spirit of joy and pride in accomplishment of a natural birth is indeed contagious.

This is a great book for men or women. It’s mainly aimed to convince people to stay away from medical-centered birth and give basic information to empower the birth partner or husband for assisting at the birth. I read this book when I was overseas and there were no Bradley classes available. I felt like I needed more specific examples of techniques, so I’m glad I also had access to Natural Childbirth the Bradley Way by Susan McCutcheon. These two books together are a perfect match! In the end, I had a natural water birth with my midwife and husband encouraging and advocating for me. Highly recommended.

Great book. My partner read this when I was pregnant with our son, and he found a lot of useful tips for a natural birth. Men can sometimes feel left out of the whole thing, so having a book directed towards the partner and his role was very helpful in making him feel included.

Glad I bought it- it was required reading for my Bradley Class, but after reading the reviews I wasn't sure if I wanted to purchase it. The reviews made it sound like it would not be beneficial for the mother to read, only the partner/husband (and I knew I would be the only one reading it). But, I'm really glad I did buy it and read it. There were a few pages I marked and had my husband read that I thought would be greatly beneficial for him, but I am not disappointed I bought it and read it myself.

My husband and I did not planning on taking a Bradley class, though we did want to make use of the method. I checked this book out from the library first and read through the entire thing in a week. I learned SO much about my pregnancy and what to expect in labor. It is also the first book I've read that is focused on including the husband and valuing his worth as coach and partner in laboring. Though Dr. Bradley does talk about exercises and breathing and relaxation techniques, as well as what to focus on in preparation, I recommend looking into something else for more detailed explanations (and illustrations) of laboring positions and more details on what to expect (and how to work through it). We purchased this book for my husband to read through and I am now reading McCutcheon's "Natural Birth the Bradley Way: Revised Edition" for the break down. So I would say if you are forgoing a Bradley Class (which I do recommend if you have the time/money), buy this book for the theory and understanding and then McCutcheon's book for the practice and preparation.

Dr. Bradley's book provides a comprehensive explanation of his approach to childbirth. My wife and I read it when we were expecting our first child and trying to learn as much as possible about how to safely bring our son into the world. The book helped us understand what to expect in the pregnancy and birthing process and also helped us to mentally prepare for the big day. Two downsides:-Dr. Bradley spends considerable time defending his perspective on natural childbirth and some of his arguments are a little outdated. If you buy this book, you have likely already decided that you want a natural birth and do not need the "why" spelled out.-At the risk of sounding like a 9-year-old, there are no pictures. This is an issue because exercises and relaxation techniques are described in words rather than depicted. So, do what we did and order a copy of Susan McCutcheon's "Natural Childbirth the Bradley Way" which does contain pictures. In all, if you are planning on a natural childbirth get this book.

We bought this book because we took Bradley Method classes. We didn't love it. He is a rambler and often times long winded. There are things he could have said in one sentence that he said in paragraphs. It's not the easiest read. Also, while we love the Bradley Method, he is very passionate about natural birth and kind of bashes other types of birth. Make sure to take everything with a grain of salt, and know that there are other views and opinions. It was still a great read and helped my husband and I form opinions that we probably would not have thought about had we not read the book and taken the classes.

My husband and I are 7 mos pregnant and currently taking The Bradley Method classes (Husband Coached Childbirth). This book was recommended reading for the class and since we wanted to have the full experience, we went ahead and bought the book (also required was the Student Handbook and "Natural Childbirth the Bradley Way: Revised Edition" another great book). We took the class for personal reasons and had decided that natural childbirth was the way to go for our first baby. This book is very informative and easy to read. My husband likes it better than the other book, NCTBW, because this is almost always talking directly to the Husband or Coach (they explain the use of the word "husband" and not "partner") and it is a very conversational type of writing. There are more scientific and medical sections of the book - they explain the birthing process in detail so any layman can understand what is happening. It provides a section on birthing techniques as well as the issues of c-section (non emergency) and drug use. The best parts have been the ones that provide the birthing parents with lots of great information about why each one is necessary in the process of childbirth - it really helps you create a team outlook in this process and if you are serious about it, it will strengthen your relationship and help you appreciate each other all the more. I highly recommend that if you are interested in having a natural, unmedicated childbirth for whatever reasons, you read this book. It is very clear and concise while still being quite familiar and easy to read. If you can, take one of the classes locally because it will help a lot with practicing techniques that are provided in the book.

Studying to be a doula, this is a great book for understanding how to support the husband as well as the wife.
