Models And Pathways For Person-Centered Elder Care :Leading Principles & Practices In Elder Care

Synopsis

Volume 2 in Leading Principles & Practices in Elder Care series This second volume examines the issues and practices behind the day-to-day implementation of individualized elder care. Through profiles of pioneering model communities, readers learn what person-centered care looks like in practice. From the providers who are raising the bar for best practices in long-term care, readers gain direct experience in the successful processes behind transforming attitudes, practices, physical spaces, and organizational structures to accommodate increasingly collaborative and person-directed care. Professional staff from nurses to social workers to administrators will learn about the essential skills to be mastered and probable challenges to be overcome in the transformational journey from traditional elder care services to progressive modern ideals

Judah L. Ronch, Ph.D., is Executive Clinical Director and Founder of LifeSpan Developmental Systems, an organization that has established numerous creative, interdisciplinary clinical and training programs to meet the mental health needs of older adults in various parts of the United States. Dr. Ronch consults with the New York State Department of Health on person-centered care for people with Alzheimer's disease; in nursing homes, assisted living, and adult care facilities. Prior to this position he served on the allied health services staff of the Department of Internal Medicine at Vassar Brothers Hospital in Poughkeepsie, New York, and as Director of the Four Winds Geriatric Service at the Four Winds Hospital in Katonah, New York. Dr Ronch, Vice President of the Board of Directors of the Gerontological Institute, State University of New York in New Paltz, has served on numerous other boards and committees including the Dementia Advisory committee of the New York State Department of Health. Dr. Ronch is former director of the Brookdale Center on Aging at Hunter College of the City University of New York. He has written or contributed to numerous books devoted to issues of aging and strengths-based gerontological approaches, including The Counseling Sourcebook (edited with Van Ornum & Stilwell, Crossroad Publishing Company, 1994) and Alzheimer's Disease: A Practical Guide for Those Who Help Others (Crossroad-Continuum, 1989). In addition, he has published in various journals including Counseling the Aging and Their Families, American Journal of Alzheimer's Disease, Nursing Home Economics, and American Journal of Alzheimer's Care and Research.

I really think chapter 16 which talks about issues of dealing with dementia and work load, time and relationships with direct care needs to be given a lot of attention by facilities. Caring for staff is ultimately as important in person-centered elder care as it is about dealing with the elders' with dementia. Person-centered care.
